

Bembridge a wide beach at low tide, ideal for prawning, rockpools and family barbecues

Dinosaur Isle
Dinosaur Isle is Britain's first purpose-built dinosaur museum and visitor attraction.

The Island's diverse geology contains a wealth of fossils. These tell us much about the past and give clues to the effects of possible future environmental changes. Starting around 126 million years ago, the rocks contain the best exposures of dinosaur material in Europe. Many dinosaur finds have been made in the cliffs at Sandown.

The castle was finally demolished in the time of Charles I, before the present-day town of Sandown was established. Its site is now the Sandham Grounds public park, between Fort Street and Culver Parade, and it is said that some of its remains are still visible at low tide.

Although Sandown Castle was never attacked, in 1545 it was the scene of a desperate battle with French invaders who had landed at Whitecliff Bay and made their way over Culver Down amid heavy skirmishing. They were repulsed.

Henrician Castles, these were a network of coastal defences intended to defend against the threat of the French and Spanish after Henry's break from the Roman Catholic Church.

Isle of Wight Zoo
The Island's first zoo was established here during the 1950s. Known locally as Sandown Zoo, it was built within the walls of the existing Victorian fort.

Tigers were introduced at the end of the 1970s and the zoo enjoyed several tiger births. By the early 1990s, there was a range of animals, including leopards. Today, the Isle of Wight Zoo has established itself as a serious centre for wild animal conservation.

Whitecliff Bay and Culver Cliff
The cliffs at Whitecliff Bay are soft clays and sands, which are constantly crumbling and slipping. This process is important for wildlife as it allows for a constantly renewed habitat.

There are some remarkable geological formations. At Bembridge, the rocks are relatively young, being 1.8 million years old whereas the upper chalk layers at Culver Cliff are 65 million years old. At low tide, some of the best rockpools in England are exposed where there are seaweeds, anemones, and other coastal wildlife.

Sandown Castle
Sandown Castle was one of Henry VIII's Device Forts, which were built from 1544 onwards. Also known as

Culver Battery
Built in 1906, this is one of many fortifications created to defend the sea approaches to Portsmouth. It was manned during both world wars. There were two gun emplacements and underground bunkers where shells were stored. All the guns were removed in 1956 and the emplacements filled in.

Later, he bought a smaller vessel The Kestrel, but died on board suddenly, in 1846. The Royal Yacht Squadron Committee paid for the monument which was originally placed further west of its current position, but was moved when Prime Minister Palmerston built a moated fort in 1867.

In 1825 he was appointed first Commodore of the Royal Yacht Squadron at Cowes. During this time, yachting flourished and the club grew in numbers and reputation. Lord Yarborough was passionate about the sea and sailing – his most famous ship was the full-rigged Falcon. In 1825 he was appointed first Commodore of the Royal Yacht Squadron at Cowes. During this time, yachting flourished and the club grew in numbers and reputation.
